HUMANIZING ENGLISH LANGUAGE TEACHING

Announcement and Call for Papers

Language teaching has long been related to humanism. Ever since the Humanist Psychology movement that emerged in the 1950s with Abraham Maslow 1970, Carl Rogers 1964 and others, and its focus on counseling and self-help, education in general, and language teaching in particular, have intermittently incorporated various dozes of humanism throughout the years. The role of the affect in language learning and teaching has become a central topic in educational circles. It has equally been argued that key notions in current pedagogical practices such as ‘learner-centredness’ and ‘engagement’ are at the heart of ‘humanism’.

Critical pedagogy embodies humanism as it advocates giving the learner more leeway to reflect and act. It is in this regard that it reconceptualises education to make of it a less “dehumanizing” and a more pleasurable experience, whereby teachers and learners simultaneously swap roles through meaningful dialogism and constantly engage in paraxial thinking. A dehumanizing type of education, according to Freire (1970) and Giroux (2012), is one that promotes debilitating dichotomies (e.g. teacher- learner, researcher-practitioner), and conceives of knowledge as a gift being bestowed by teachers upon those whom they consider to know nothing. Oppressive as it may seem, this "banking" approach defines the teacher as the "depositor" and the students as the "depositories". Conversely, humanizing education aims to locate instances of oppression in educational and literary discourses, and to subsequently contest them through epistemic plurality (post-feminism, post-colonialism, post-structuralism, post-modernism) and liberatory pedagogy.

The conference aims to foreground the urgent need to humanize education, namely to look for ways that would support the learners to be cognitively, emotionally, and psychologically prepared to acquire English language. It also seeks to redress the discrepancy between the educational philosophy stated in official documents and classroom practices. In short, humanizing education is meant to empower teachers, learners, and stakeholders to become agents of change, to create and re-create society and to increase freedom. A humanizing education heals, repairs and transforms.

TATE 6th International Conference and Exhibition invites participants from diverse disciplines to take part in a constructive dialogue about the pedagogical possibilities to promote interpersonal and intercultural competences, and to apply the fundamental tenets of humanistic education such as personal growth, the development of human values, and the active engagement of learners affectively and intellectually. The conference will also be a chance for ELT professionals to explore new approaches and discuss major challenges in teaching English in Tunisia and beyond.
